

Christine Talbot

Expert in workplace culture and individual and team performance

As senior vice president of human resources at World Vision, Christine oversees more than 1,100 employees across the country. She joined World Vision in 2015, leading efforts to build a strong, high-performing staff and ensure resilience through organizational changes.

Christine has more than 25 years of broad experience in human resources leadership, with a focus on building staff capability and navigating change. Before joining World Vision, she was vice president of human resources at Kaiser Permanente. In this role she supported business and shared services functions, and led national diversity and inclusion operations including health initiatives for diverse communities. She previously worked at Qwest and AT&T, with a focus on providing HR support to technology teams.

Christine holds a Bachelor of Arts in psychology from Wheaton College. She has completed graduate coursework in human resources at Benedictine University and participated in an executive education program at Harvard. Long active in supporting the career development of women, she volunteers with college students to help them discover how faith informs their vocation and work.

Christine and her husband, Tim, have two sons and live in Auburn, Washington with the family beagle, Hershey.
